The Master of Science Degree in Addiction Studies is a research oriented, professional degree that prepares students for leadership roles in the intervention, prevention and treatment (i.e., counseling services) of addictions (such as alcohol, tobacco, drugs, food, and gambling) as well as a leadership roles in research, evaluation, and program management. Completion of the degree requirements does not guarantee automatic certification or re-certification in either prevention or treatment. The degree, however, should help students meet some of the educational experiences required by prevention and treatment certification boards.
